Wesley Brown's Goal Workshop: Bucket List

The first obvious requirement to having what you want in life is, knowing what you want. Most people can give you a detailed list of what they DON'T want (at least verbally); but how many people actually articulate in writing the things they desire to accomplish during their lifetime? We set goals for clarity, purpose, and fulfillment. We use our goals as a means of clarifying what we want to achieve and as a compass for focused purposeful living. Goal setting is a trait of a successful achiever. The simple act of committing to paper what you want to do, be and have serves as an attraction magnet to invite great things into your life. While it can't be proven that every person who has set clear goals got what they were after, it can be shown that no success has been brought about by uncertain intentions. Instructor: Wesley Brown.

Organizing Memorabilia: Choosing What to Keep

Ah, memorabilia: those photos, cards, letters, mementos, and knickknacks that remind us of the people, places, and times in our lives we love best. Memorabilia can be a wonderful thing, but it can also grow to be overwhelming, and can sometimes seem nearly impossible to store in any remotely orderly way.

Fear not: there are ways of weeding out the mementos you truly want to keep and creating storage systems that will keep them safe, accessible, and contained. We'll take a look at how to go about choosing the memorabilia that's most important to you; next, we'll explore some storage systems and tools that will protect your memories for years to come. When it comes to sorting and weeding items with sentimental value, many traditional organizing tactics go out the window: asking "When was the last time I used this?" might be an effective way of deciding whether to keep a certain kitchen utensil, but it's not very useful when you're faced with a stack of old letters. Memorabilia often brings with it a raft of hidden emotions, and sorting through it can require the emotional equivalent of kid gloves. Instructor: Wesley Brown.
